For American democracy to reflect the will of voters, truth matters. How do we learn about the important events of the day and sort fact and fiction? The Post-Truth Era began years ago. It has coincided with increased political polarization, a decline of trust in science and shrinkage of traditional news media outlets. The League of Women Voters of Greater Tucson has assembled a panel of local academic and journalism experts to discuss the difference between fact and fiction and what steps voters can take to better determine if something is true or false.

SPEAKERS:

Kate Kanski, Associate Professor of Communications, U. of Arizona:

Explaination campaigns—those focused on climate science to those directed at undermining the credibility of news media—have become commonplace. Understanding disinformation techniques and tactics may help to prepare voters to identify it, but several cognitive biases prevalent in all humans make the task difficult to tackle the magnitude of this problem at an individual level.

Chris Water, Associate Professor of Government & Public Policy, U. of Arizona:

The psychological and social science features of the Post-Truth Era involve faster trial allusion, erosion of critical thinking, low voter turnout and strong emotions like fear, anger, exaltation, and alienation.

Cullen Smith, Editor and Publisher, TucsonSentinel.com:

Trust in traditionally trustworthy civic institutions — the press, scientific, community and government organizations — has been systematically attacked, even in many of these groups have outlasted, but individuals can play a role in rebuilding the social capital of sources they rely on, and encouraging the development of new ones.

Jeff Jordon Spitz, Editor, Arizona Daily Star:

The 2018 election, like all elections, are based on the premise that voters are guardians of American democracy. However, in a post-truth era, voter apathy may result in less informed elections that reflect our real intentions. We all must distinguish between fact and fiction, and rely on facts.

March for Science Southern Arizona is looking for a team of politically active volunteers to help illuminate the science related platforms of 2018 Electoral Candidates. To accomplish this we will:

1. Develop a set of original, non-partisan, non-leading questions to ask candidates running for local, state, and federal elected office. These questions would not only speak to national science-related issues, but also to science-related issues specific to Southern Arizona.
2. Interview each candidate running for elected office, asking them to address the questions.
3. Record their responses. VOTE4SCIENCE is a guide that’s easy to read.

We need your help making these goals a reality and helping to better inform voters where their candidates stand on science-related issues!

If this sounds like something you’d be interested in, please email marchfor sciencesa@gmail.com.
